It was told in the future of humanity that the world was growing old and exhausted and a new era would come. Zentaol has made it clear to me that I should save my post and I will do so. However, due to the nature of the thread and the ongoing nature of problems with my Internet provider, I can not guarantee I will be able to answer any and all questions. I will update the thread as soon as possible. I also have been given permission to upload from my main site, so, in the interest of speed, I will upload the logos at that location. You will be required to copy and paste the links at the top of this post. in a "Reliable, Reasonable Accommodation" policy. It is in those policies that they should be consistent to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission standards. For instance, it states that there will be "no discrimination against an applicant or employee" or "disregard for disability". These are all areas in which many companies are not able to provide a consistent or satisfactory response. How does this affect you? If you are doing business with a company, you should always be sure to check their policies. You will be required to make sure that they are not excluding "disabled veterans" in making such decisions as hiring, training, and promotion. Do not be afraid to ask questions about the policies, like, "What are the guidelines in regard to hiring disabled veterans?" Asking those questions will be the first step in deciding if you want to do business with them. The 8th Article of Amendment to the Constitution of the United States specifies that there shall not be any slavery in the nation. When slavery still existed in the states of the Union, it was hard to enforce, and in this week's edition of the Hearts of America, we take a look at how slavery has evolved since the repeal of the 13th and 14th Amendments, by taking a look at some of the owners of slaves, as reported by The New York Times. Imhotep P. Ellis Ellis lived in Virginia. He owned several slaves, and was also permitted to house them in an approved person's house for the purposes of attending church, and for funerals. The slaves also helped him with his farming and transportation chores. The slaves were illiterate, but they were permitted to go to school once a week.
