A novel anti-oxidant flavonoid prevents oxidative stress and inflammation in pressure overloaded rat hearts. Cardiovascular disorders, such as congestive heart failure, are known to be complicated by cardiovascular abnormalities that are the result of oxidative stress and inflammation. Flavonoids that possess anti-oxidant properties have been identified as potential antioxidants. However, their potential to ameliorate congestive heart failure has not been fully investigated. To investigate the anti-oxidant potential of the flavonoid acacetin, an in vitro study was performed to elucidate the efficacy of an oral dose of acacetin on pressure overload in rats and the in vivo efficacy of intramyocardial injections of acacetin on stroke volume. Isolated perfused rat hearts were subjected to increased afterloads through aortic occlusion. In both models of increased afterload, the load-induced increase in the left ventricular end diastolic pressure and decrease in the left ventricular systolic pressure were attenuated in the presence of acacetin. Isolated perfused hearts and isolated left ventricular cardiomyocytes subjected to hypoxia and reoxygenation and endothelial cell cultures exposed to lysophosphatidylcholine (LPC), the lipid peroxidation (LPO) inducer, showed improved preservation of membrane integrity by acacetin. Furthermore, acacetin was demonstrated to inhibit LPO and enhance the glutathione content in myocardial tissue. Treatment with acacetin also suppressed the expression of inducible nitric oxide synthase and pro-inflammatory cytokines, including tumor necrosis factor- α , interleukin-1 β , and interleukin-6. The in vivo anti-oxidant efficacy of acacetin was confirmed by the reduction in myocardial levels of lipid peroxides, 8-hydroxy-2'-deoxyguanosine, and 4-hydroxy-2-nonenal. In addition, the angiogenic activity of acacetin was determined in a rat hind limb ischemia model. The results demonstrated the protective effect of acacetin against oxidative stress in the heart, which was involved in LPO, and inflammation in vitro and in vivo.

Q: How do I force IE8 to refresh itself on runtime?
I'd like to run a child process on IE8. I'm aware of IE8's lack of JavaScript and external scripts.
