A method for optimizing the in vitro and in vivo transformation efficiency of epidermal keratinocytes using a platelet-derived growth factor-BB (PDGF-BB) supplemented DMEM culture system. The aim of this work was to establish a reliable and simplified method for assessing the in vitro and in vivo transformation efficiency of epidermal keratinocytes using a PDGF-BB supplemented DMEM culture system. We hypothesize that the PDGF-BB supplemented culture system can be utilized to optimise the in vitro transformation efficiency of epidermal keratinocytes and this will lead to a more reproducible and less labour intensive process for the transformation of epidermal keratinocytes. A dermal equivalent was prepared from neonatal rat-derived epidermis by subcutaneous transplantation of the dermal equivalent to nude mice. The epidermal keratinocytes (EKs) were isolated from this dermal equivalent by incubation with trypsin-EDTA solution and cultured in a PDGF-BB supplemented medium. The optimal concentration of PDGF-BB and the ratio of EK to dermal equivalent for preparing a reconstituted dermis were determined. The in vitro transformation efficiency of the EKs was assessed by subcutaneous transplantation of the EKs to nude mice. The transforming ability of the EKs was compared in vitro with and without the influence of the dermal equivalent. The optimal concentration of PDGF-BB and the ratio of EK to dermal equivalent were 9.6 ng/ml and 2:1 (w/w), respectively. The dermal equivalent did not affect the growth and transformation ability of the EKs significantly. The present study demonstrates a simple method for the transformation of epidermal ker
