It has been suggested that the septo-hippocampal axis is important in the neural mediation of defensive responses to stress and that any damage to this system results in impairments in the appropriate expression of these behaviors. This hypothesis was tested with a series of lesion studies of the medial septal nucleus (MS) and the dorsal hippocampus in which maximal excitotoxic damage was obtained for each structure. The behavioral effects of these lesions on the expression of defensive behaviors on an open-field basis were assessed both quantitatively and qualitatively by measuring certain components of this behavior, including numbers of rearing, exploratory scratching, grooming, and headdips. A partial lesion of the MS did not affect rearing but did affect exploratory scratching. A partial lesion of the dorsal hippocampus also did not affect rearing, but when combined with a lesion of the dorsal hippocampus, increased rearing. The greatest impairments were, however, seen with combined lesions of the medial septum and dorsal hippocampus. These abnormalities included a reduction in rearing, impaired exploratory scratching,
