I have service calls that I make at the end of every method in my view. Since I expect multiple users to access the same service, and there is no need to do anything with the service call result, I do not want to block the user while making the call and returning the result, as the user is not the one making the call. I will be using `django.db.transaction.atomic()` is used in place of using a transaction block in the service call. Does performing several method calls without a transaction block between the method calls affect the performance of the service call? Will it affect the maximum number of concurrent users? A: You need to use atomic transactions to make sure that changes across multiple database operations aren't committed all at once, this includes both write and read operations. `atomic` is fairly fast for read operations because it basically just reads the record from the database and returns it immediately. But if it needs to write to the database, it's needs to read the entire record (and therefore write it to the database) before it can return it to the user, this means that the read and write operation is blocked. So yes, the more different operations you have in a transaction, the slower it will be. By Stephanie Kaplan Two young women in New York survived super-duper scary falls when they fell hundreds of feet off cliffs. The dramatic, harrowing fall happened Feb. 22 in Cattaraugus County, N.Y. The women, ages 22 and 18, and their companions were climbing the cliff face above the abandoned Palisades [N.Y. P13] ski resort in Fairmont, N.Y., when they dropped from a ledge, state police said. The women landed in a snow bank next to a cliff and survived. The group then moved away from the brink, returning to the site later that day. The two women decided to hike down, and one of the women slipped and fell more than two-hundred-fifty feet, police said. After the women were found by rescue workers, they were brought to an infirmary at the site. Fortunately, no serious injuries were reported. The group was able to ride a ski lift down, and the women were not injured. They left the winter wonderland on the morning of Feb. 24, when they were met by law enforcement officers, according to the Cattaraugus County Sheriff's Office. The men, ages 24 and 28, were 6d1f23a050
