Once cracked, simply open Word, Access, or Publisher, open the document and enter your Dumpster key. It will start to process the document and then save it back to the same file as it was originally (minus the?.docx extension). You can now view the file with all of its sensitive data in the clear. The hash cracker or hash breaker is a program that breaks a code or password in to its individual characters. Once done, this is handed off to another program called a password "breaker". The password breaker then processes the password and, based on the kind of password you're looking to crack, it finds the character distribution that makes the most sense. This is a brute-force attack, but it's much less laborious and time-consuming than using a traditional dictionary attack or a brute-force search. For this particular hash, we're looking for a single 16-character hash. Luckily, it's very simple to determine what that should be. We see that the Passwords it's given have a typical MS Office format of Vxxxxxx where "V" is the Microsoft version number and "xx" is an incrementing number like "10". We also note that the hash is stored in the Word header, and the hex digest of that hash would look something like this: DEBFE634F3FE6E8E. The password hash we just found is a 100% correct guess, and most of the time, this would be all we would have to go on. However, in addition to the password hash, we also have some information from the file header. The first thing we get from the header is the Word document version number, which is 5.0 in this case. This is a number used by Microsoft Office but its not always just 7,8,9, or 2010. In this case, we're looking for older Office versions for when the document was created, so we can get a little more information from this. The version number doesn't give us much information, but we can get further help from the file extension. The file extension in this case is.xml, so let's try looking for a hash hash of this extension. Luckily, our hash digest is "DEBFE634F3FE6E8E", and we can start looking in the extensions for that hash. A quick Google search returned a link to Hashes.io, which houses a big database of hashes for Microsoft Office documents.
