When the next version of Photoshop comes out you can rest assured that the DNG format will be its default file format. It has been around since the early versions of Photoshop and is used to reduce the space required to store images. Since its first release, DNG files have slowly become more popular as a file format. As you update your camera, you fall in love with the RAW file format of your camera. However, you may not be able to help but dream of creating and adjusting your photos the way you want them even if it means discarding the original file. For this, you need to convert DNG to TIFF or vice versa, but creating and using an external program is a pain in the ass. So Adobe Photoshop introduced a built-in DNG support, and you can now export your photos to DNG without using any other third-party software. With the new Creative Suite, it is possible to add extensions from just one, and other files to the Creative Cloud. If you have a common extension on a series of files, it can help you to add it or link the files, and organize them. If you take, for example, a series of images, you can import all of them into the folder of a JPG, and organize them. You can rename the file by moving it to the folder of a specific extension, or use the asset options, and load it.
